AUTHORS DR. M. SALOMO-DAVIES AND R. DAVIES

The National Resource Centers on Children and Families of the Incarcerated report that more than 2.7 million children, or one in twenty-eight, have an incarcerated parent in the United States. These children are often pulled into the cycle of drug abuse, violence, and crime themselves, following their parents' footsteps on the path to incarceration. After personally experiencing this hostile social environment themselves and recognizing the transformative power of the gospel to change their own lives, the authors decided to face this issue head-on through a study that combined qualitative research with the personal narratives of at-risk children.

Children’s Liberation from Incarceration is the result of their work, providing a model for helping the children of incarcerated parents have victory over adversity through the power of the gospel. This book captures both the children’s stories and points to a practical methodology for community churches and government support services that divert them from the prison track.

Join the authors in their work to give at-risk children healing, growth, and residency through the redeeming work of Christ.

Praise for Children's Liberation from Incarceration
"I am pleased to endorse the "Breaking the Cycle of Incarceration" model and Children’s Liberation from Incarceration with support from Washington, D.C.-based Prison Fellowship International."

AUTHORS BIOGRAPHY

Dr. Salomo-Davies has appeared on cable networks and has been recognized by J.U.S. litigation for helping children to break the cycle of incarceration. Salomo-Davies are advocates for the millions of children left behind by incarcerated parents. Investing in the children is critical to decrease school dropout, drugs, gang resistance and diversion from involvement in juvenile justice. Both interventions has increased the children’s capacities to become first generation graduates, skilled workers and earning a legal salary.
