SHOES ON, OR SHOES OFF?

Do you take your shoes off when you enter your home? Or do you wear them around the house the same way you do outside?

I used to think the answer to this question mirrored the answer to whether you make your bed every morning or not, wash your car every week or not, or make to-do lists or not. Today, I think the answer to the shoes on or shoes off question has more to do with something else. I will get to that in a moment.

I realize, as most of you do, that our habits are formed by what our parents made us do, or not do, repeatedly. In my childhood home, all shoes were taken off at the door. There were no exceptions. If any of us even attempted to sneak in with shoes on, we would be the ones on our hands and knees washing the kitchen floor for a week. There were rules, and there were consequences — and mom was the judge, jury and executioner.

I simply thought this was the rule in every household. So, when I went to other people's homes, the first thing I did was take off my shoes. Even if my friends' mothers or fathers told me not to worry about it, I still did it. I think I worried that Mom might find out, and I didn't want to wash any more floors.

Jolene's parents had the same rule and were equally strict about it, so this easily carried over into our home. The irony was, when her parents would visit, they would wear their shoes inside our home — until I pointed out the rules and consequences to them. They didn't want to wash the kitchen floor, either.

What I have now realized is that the overlooked factor in the answer to the shoes on or shoes off question is age. Shoes are not as easy to take on or off as we get older. That whole balancing on one foot thing is a trick. My dad used to have a small bench by the door so he could sit down and take his shoes off. Now, I get it.

Jolene and I are not as particular about taking our shoes off at our door as our parents were. Our shoes are stored in our bedroom closet, and we put them on there and walk through the house. And, maybe not surprisingly, I have a small chair in the bedroom where I sit to put my shoes on. Also, our bare, aging feet don't feel so great on hard floors. An effective alternative we implemented is to don some cozy slippers, at least in the colder months.

I must admit, though, when I go to other people's homes, I take my shoes off at the door. Mom might still be watching, and I don't want to have to wash their kitchen floors.

Have a great week, and thanks for reading. ■
